The multilayered printed circuit board is formed by alternately laminating conductor circuits and insulating layers. The conductor circuits include, for example, a copper foil circuit for electrically connecting the circuits, a non-conductive resin circuit for preventing electromagnetic interference, a through hole conductor circuit for electrically connecting the copper foil circuit and the non-conductive resin circuit, and the like. The conventional multilayered printed circuit board, however, has a problem that the conductive copper foil circuit and the non-conductive resin circuit are separated by a thick layer of the insulating resin as a base, causing a difference in the thermal expansion coefficient. As a result, there is a problem that micro cracks are generated in the interface between the copper foil circuit and the non-conductive resin circuit at the time of a heating process or the like during manufacturing, and the peel strength decreases. Further, as a result of applying a photo-curing epoxy resin composition which is applied on the whole surface of the copper foil circuit and the non-conductive resin circuit, a thick layer of the epoxy resin remains at the portion corresponding to the interface between the conductor circuits, causing a problem that a desired peel strength cannot be obtained between the conductor circuit and the insulating resin. The following method is known
