The RankPeak is one of the most widely used statistics for digital music. It is used to determine the optimal position of a song in a physical or digital music store. A music player can use RankPeak for many purposes, for example as a playlist sorting method or as a timer for running music in the background. In our eyes the RankPeak is far more powerful than the usual statistics of tracks such as the most played time, the total playing time or the number of played times. The RankPeak is the highest ranking for the currently played track and always presents a list that is built according to this particular ranking. The list can be sorted by track, artist, album or year. Furthermore, the ranking data can be sorted by any date, e.g. the most played song in June 2001, the oldest song or the best songs of 2002. The RankPeak is based on an analysis of music consumption behavior on a wide range of online music store sites. At the moment we do not consider a single site in detail but rather the average of all sites. The RankPeak not only uses hard-to-manipulate statistics like the most played time or the total playing time, but rather the most important and relevant attributes. We prefer to present actual data over a text visualization of the music consumption. When sorting by RankPeak, the most played time is only the basis for the ranking. The RankPeak of a track is adjusted with an additional factor. This factor is determined by the music consumption behavior of users and influences the ranking so that the most played track is always at the top. The RankPeak is therefore an up-to-date ranking of the most played tracks and is continuously being improved. The RankPeak is one of the most widely used statistics for digital music. What's New In AirMusic?

AirMusic is a simple and small but functional MP3 player. The software features several backgrounds that are included out of the box, but these can be easily replaced with the ones you like best. Since it is a small, lightweight application, users can run it directly from the USB stick without the need of having it installed. The interface is quite simple, there is a main window with a playlist and a status bar to the bottom, featuring information like time elapsed, percentage of file play, total tracks loaded, etc. If the player is playing a file, a little progress bar at the bottom will show the percentage of the tracks you have loaded, allowing you to quickly jump to the end of the queue. The progress bar can be hidden if you prefer. Additionally, the playlist window allows you to browse tracks by artist, album, title or even by genre. You can also play only certain tracks in a session. Most of the interface is free of distractions and allows users to get on with their work in a clean environment. A nice feature is the possibility to run your songs in the background using the "Open in background" context menu option. To give the job to your USB stick, simply unplug it and the player will run automatically. The player supports MP3s only. The player features a function to speed up the tempo of the file. You can select values ranging from 25% to 500% of the original file playback speed. One of the features that sets it apart from others is the possibility to display song metadata, such as the title, artist, album, year, genre and comments. There is a thumbnail associated to each file, which can be used to help you identify a track quickly. A special folder is added to the music location to store all your loaded songs. This is an extremely useful feature, as the number of files can quickly pile up and it is really difficult to find the specific song you are looking for. A simple and efficient music player In general, AirMusic is a very simple and functional player that can be easily run from USB. The GUI is simple and the amount of features is not overwhelming. The program supports only MP3s, so you will not find any video playback functionality.
